Regina Lee Roberts (she, her, hers) is the Head of the Social Sciences Resource Group and a collection development librarian. Regina's work centers on facilitating the research process by connecting academic researchers to library resources, research collections and data. Regina assists Stanford University students, faculty, staff and visiting scholars in the navigation and organization of information resources and teaches library research workshops with the goal of enabling researchers to dig deeper into the invaluable collections held by Stanford University Libraries.

Collection development responsibilities include the following subject areas:
Anthropology, Archaeology & Sub-Saharan African Collections

Within these subject areas, Regina serves as the primary liaison between the library and the aforementioned academic departments, programs, faculty. Regina provides in-person and online consultations as well as library tours and workshops. Regina designs learner-centered workshops infused with course specific content and invites Stanford faculty and teaching assistants to contact her to schedule a session.

Regina is interested in archiving social science data for long term preservation and re-use and has been the library liaison to the Stanford Big Local News Project. Regina also leads the collection development for the Black Graphic Design History Collections.
