Giovanna Ceserani works on the classical tradition with an emphasis on the intellectual history of classical scholarship, historiography and archaeology from the eighteenth century onwards. She is interested in the role that Hellenism and Classics played in the shaping of modernity and, in turn, in how the questions we ask of the classical past originate in specific modern cultural, social and political contexts.

Her book Italy's Lost Greece: Magna Graecia and the making of modern archaeology appeared from Oxford University Press in 2012. Her current book project concerns the emergence of modern histories of ancient Greece; she is now also writing on the transformations of antiquarianism in the eighteenth century and on modern travels to ancient lands. Her interest in travel is engaging new digital approaches with a focus on the Grand Tour for the Stanford digital humanities project Mapping the Republic of Letters (<http://republicofletters.stanford.edu/>)

Research & Scholarship

CURRENT RESEARCH AND SCHOLARLY INTERESTS

Giovanna Ceserani works on the classical tradition with an emphasis on the intellectual history of classical scholarship, historiography and archaeology from the eighteenth century onwards. She is interested in the role that Hellenism and Classics played in the shaping of modernity and, in turn, in how the questions we ask of the classical past originate in specific modern cultural, social and political contexts.

Her book Italy's Lost Greece: Magna Graecia and the making of modern archaeology appeared from Oxford University Press in 2012. She is currently working on eighteenth travel to Italy, both as a digital humanist--she is the director of the Stanford digital Grand Tour Project, which involves the study of thousands of travelers to Italy, and in writing a book on the joint 1760s travels to Sicily of two professors, one from Cambridge and the other from Naples, which she is reconstructing based on archival research. Her other current work concerns the emergence of modern histories of ancient Greece.
